Transition economies are involved in a process of moving from a centrally planned economy to a mixed or free market economy

Some key aspects of the transition process

Liberalization of markets to give prices a bigger role in allocating scarce resources between competing uses

Privatisation of government (state) assets – transferred to the private sector

Reduction in tariff and other trade barriers so that the economy becomes more open

Reduction in the scale and scope of government subsidies e.g. to loss making industries

Different Strategies of Transition to a Market Economy Marek Dabrowski, 1999 March 1996 The government's ability to act fast and with determination is more important to radical economic reform than technical perfection in designing new policy instruments Political consent to reform measures lasts a short time so it should be used in full If the window of opportunity is ignored the next one may be a long time coming In 1989 the former communist countries embarked on a transition from centrally planned command economies to market economies and from repressive dictatorships to Western style democracies In addressing the question What is the optimal strategy for this transformation Dabrowski revisits the controversy about how quickly and radically the new market rules and their components should be adopted in the former communist countries and discusses the economic and political problems associated with different strategies Among his conclusions Generally the faster and more comprehensive the economic reform the more chance there is to minimize its economic social and political costs and to avoid chronic macroeconomic mismanagement A more radical and disciplined path of transition is all the more important when initial conditions are less favorable and negative external shocks are greater Only countries such as Hungary which had made some progress in market oriented reform before communism's collapse and which experienced less macroeconomic disequilibrium could go more slowly Political liberalization and democratization helps the economic transition succeed mainly because it helps weaken the political positions of the traditional communist oligarchy nomenclatura which is interested mainly in rent seeking Unless stabilization and liberalization are achieved quickly microeconomic restructuring cannot be expected to progress quickly even if privatization does as it has in Russia Other aspects of the transition may take more time For privatization to succeed for example a legal base and organizational infrastructure must be created But even with privatization a rapid transition is less risky for restructuring and for complex institutional reform than a slow transition There is no way to avoid a relatively large decline in output especially of industrial production in the state sector Granting concessions to and bargaining with various pressure groups does not produce the expected political results or increase social acceptance of reform Governments should not be afraid of aiming too high in embarking on a stabilization program or any other component of transformation Most post communist governments do the opposite dilute the program so much it becomes ineffective This paper a product of the Transition Economics Division Policy Research Department is part of a larger effort in the department to look at progress on macroeconomic reforms in former communist countries as they move to a market economy
